The absence of relevant research and development activities in the United Kingdom under this theme makes the United Kingdom a missed opportunity in the area of sustainable agriculture.

*Proposals for the themes of Life Cycle Assessments (LCA) and LCA in the context of climate change, to cover the whole of the food supply chain, are being supported by the UK Science & Technology Facilities Council (STFC) and the Biotechnology and Biological Sciences Research Council (BBSRC)*. **Box 1** *Theme 2: The importance of transparent and traceable methods* There is a concerted effort to include 'good laboratory practice' (GLP) in research supported under the UK NC3Rs programme. The regulatory framework in the United Kingdom requires independent research sponsors to adhere to GLP for funded research. However, the current system of GLP requires that the sponsor also analyses the protocol, so in their responsibility to society the sponsor should be willing to take on the added responsibility to analyse the protocol in order to provide an indication of the validity and usefulness of the research. The regulator in the United Kingdom is the National Institute for Health Research (NIHR). The role of the NIHR is to 'promote and develop the health and care of patients through the implementation and strategic oversight of research'. Part of the role of NIHR is to ensure that the effectiveness and efficiency of services delivered are improved. The specific mandate for the NIHR is: '...to support high quality research which improves the efficiency of health and care delivery by producing the highest quality evidence based on the best available techniques'. The NIHR also directly funds research on many topics and has an advanced research programme. There is considerable scope for funding within the NIHR research portfolio that is relevant to the theme of 'the importance of transparent and traceable methods in research'. Some of the topics being examined are: ■The level of animal suffering during research ■Ethics of genetic modification ■The potential of nanotechnology to improve health ■The ability of GPs to undertake research ■The development of electronic patient records ■The benefits of gaming to enhance learning ♦?
