The Kremlin said on Saturday that Russia is ready to deliver new S-300 air defense missile systems to Iran in response to the US sanctions on Tehran, which were enacted last week in retaliation for the shooting down of a US drone aircraft over the weekend. Kremlin spokesman Dmitry Peskov was quoted by Russia's TASS news agency as saying that the delivery will follow the schedule set by Russia's defense minister during a telephone conversation with his Iranian counterpart on Wednesday, but no additional details were revealed. Washington has said that the on-going delivery will be halted following the enactment of the new sanctions last week, but Peskov was quoted as saying the new measures were not applicable to Russia's arms export to Iran. The delivery of the S-300 system, which will be the first to be delivered to Tehran in more than a decade, is not a violation of the Iran nuclear deal, Peskov said. Referring to the drone shooting down by Iran, Peskov said that Moscow has already done everything needed to meet its obligations under the nuclear agreement, but that the United States had not fulfilled its obligations under the deal by failing to stay within the limits of the agreement set by the IAEA. The sanctions bill approved by the US Senate last week and announced on Friday included a list of entities, individuals and countries that are now prohibited from doing business with US citizens or companies. The legislation, which also authorized the United States to target assets of the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps, comes into force on Monday, although President Donald Trump has said he will not sign it into law until someone informs him it is constitutional.
