The present work describes a new and reliable methodology to determine trace metals (As, Cd, Pb and Zn) in tea leaves (Camellia sinensis) using a combination of laser-induced breakdown spectroscopy (LIBS) and nuclear reaction analysis (NRA). The multi-element profiling of tea leaves for heavy metal determination was achieved by wavelength-dependent laser-induced breakdown spectroscopy (LIBS) and a data analysis algorithm in an in-house developed multi-element system. Tea leaves were first ground and then mixed with an ablated mixture of the four trace elements. A chorine pot was used to remove the colloid in the sample. The tea suspension was then diluted to a suitable range of concentration and the solutions were analyzed with a dual-element NRA. The accuracy of the proposed method was confirmed by a comparison with the classical gravimetric analysis using the ICP-AES technique and the precision was evaluated using a tea sample of known composition. The results of NRA for four trace element analysis in tea showed a good agreement with ICP. The proposed method was also applied to analyze tea leaves of various ages. The concentrations of four trace elements (As, Cd, Pb and Zn) in tea leaves were determined by this method, and the results were verified using the traditional method. The method can provide good results for the determination of elements that are typically difficult to measure by other traditional techniques, such as As, Pb and Zn in tea leaves, which can be used in
