Eosinophils are increased in asthmatic sputum, peripheral blood, and bronchoalveolar lavage fluid (BALF) and as such have been proposed to be involved in both sputum production and airway hyperresponsiveness (AHR). We have hypothesized that there is a central role for IL-5 in the eosinophilia and AHR in asthma. Early studies demonstrated a rapid onset of AHR in response to allergen challenge that correlated with airway eosinophilia. IL-5 knockout mice have been shown to have a similar phenotype to those with a targeted disruption of the IL-5 gene, except that the response to allergen challenge in these animals is diminished rather than enhanced. We have extended these studies to show that allergen challenge of IL-5 deficient mice induced an exaggerated IL-4, IL-5, and eosinophil response and enhanced AHR compared to controls. IL-5 deficient mice had an increase in number of pulmonary mast cells at baseline and an increased release of cytokines and histamine into the airways after allergen challenge. Antibodies to IL-5 attenuated these responses in the wild type mice but had no effect in IL-5 deficient mice. We have shown that the IL-5 knockout mice were capable of clearing the allergen and this clearance was faster and more complete than their wild type littermates. These results support the hypothesis that IL-5 is the primary cytokine involved in the initiation of the airway inflammation and AHR seen in this model and suggest that enhancement of allergen clearance can be a mechanism of action for anti-IL-5 antibodies. In this project we will examine the effects of anti-IL-5 antibodies in the
