The aim of the present study was to investigate the effects of systemic or hippocampal (i.h.) infusions of the psychostimulant 4-cyano-3,4-methylenedioxymethamphetamine (MDMA) on anxiety-related behavior in rats. Hippocampal infusion of MDMA produced anxiolytic-like effects as demonstrated by increased open-field center exploration, decreased relative chamber time and diminished defecation, an indicator of stress. The anxiolytic-like effects of i.h. MDMA were not due to direct effects on 5-HT neurotransmission, since the selective 5-HT2 agonist DOI failed to produce these effects. In contrast, systemic administration of MDMA markedly increased 5-HT release in the dorsal hippocampus and this increase was blocked by pretreatment with the selective 5-HT2 antagonist methysergide, thus suggesting that local 5-HT release was responsible for the observed effects of MDMA. In addition, the effects of MDMA on 5-HT release were associated with an increase in 3,4-dihydrocannabinol (c9d1549cdd)
