Orosensory receptors in sea lamprey, Petromyzon marinus L.: are fish species differences reliable? Transient receptors (TRs) are neural sensory neurons, which exhibit rapid excitation and adaptation. They are distributed mainly in the rostral and caudal sensory ganglia, the rhombencephalon and the olfactory lobes of vertebrates. Although the cellular and molecular properties of TRs are being studied thoroughly in fish of various groups, only few studies are focused on the lamprey. The present study was undertaken to characterize TRs with a precise description of the morphology of the neurons as well as to analyze the chemosensory receptors of sea lamprey

(Petromyzon marinus L.). TRs were in large amount only in the rostral and caudal segments of the brain and rostral sensory ganglia. The TRs had the shape of large bipolar multipolar cells with several short branches at the first segment of the rostral portion of the brain and at the ganglion level. These cells also had several varicosities near the axon hillocks. It is suggested that the receptors and related neurons were used for identifying the environmental chemical cues. In the rostral segment of the brain, TRs were located in the olfactory bulbs, in the layers II-III and IV of the optic tectum, in the periventricular area of the tegmentum area, in the torus semicircularis and in the nucleus of the trigeminal root. Article content Former Baylor University basketball star Bears QB Robert Griffin III reportedly did not return to the team to participate in bowl practice this week and his status with the team remains unknown. By Sunday, the 11th ranked Bears (13-1) had beaten Penn State 38-10 in the Big 12 championship. The Baylor team opted to
