To examine the roles of perceived benefit and perceived usefulness of exergames in the attainment of physical activity (PA) among the elderly. This cross-sectional study used both a survey and an observation-based procedure. In a convenience sample of 111 community-dwelling Korean elders, we obtained self-reported PA status, validated by the 3-day PA recall. Perceived benefit and perceived usefulness of PA were assessed by the 16-item self-reported Exergames Usefulness and Benefits Scale and the 8-item self-reported PA Usefulness and Benefits Scale, respectively. Among the study participants, 90.9% reported that they were usually (69.2%) or always (20.6%) physically active. We observed that most (85.5%) participants used a computer for leisure at least once per week. There were significant positive correlations between physical activity (Borg scale) and perceived usefulness of PA ( $r = 0.18$ ,  $p = 0.0013$ )

Movies, music, software, and games are downloaded on computers through the Internet. The World Wide Web is used through the Internet. Downloading on the Internet varies in size. With increased download speed, it is possible to download music and other large files in seconds. However, email attachments can take many minutes to download or be too large to transfer through e-mail software. Security problems As the internet has become widespread, security and malware issues have emerged. Some security problems include: Viruses. Viruses are some type of malicious software that can take control of a computer. The damage that can occur ranges from a program crash to complete data loss. The programs can also download from the internet and infect a user's computer. Worms. Worms are another type of malicious software that replicates itself. It first infects a user's computer by spreading an infected file or program to other computers. Spyware. Spyware is malware that can collect information about a user's web activities, address book, files, etc. Spyware that blocks access to websites. Trojan horse software can be embedded in a legitimate file and infect the user's computer if the user opens the file. After the user opens the file, it runs as normal on the user's computer. The file then contains the malicious code that blocks access to websites that the user sees as malicious. In addition to this, it is possible that a spyware program itself is a website; thus, after the user opens the infected file, it is still possible that the spyware program itself may attempt to block access to the websites that the user sees as malicious. Malware Malware is any software that is designed to harm or exploit the functionality of a computer. Malware includes computer viruses, computer worms, Trojan horses, rootkits, and spyware. History The development of the internet has led to a few different advances in the field of online piracy: Documents When using telecommunications, there was the business of selling copies of the telephone book for profit. The telephone company would sell what they called "white pages" for $1 each. In turn, many individuals would save the number of their contact for each other, making the formation of business directories possible. The directories were then sold for profit for approximately 1/10th of the cost of those in the white pages. The going rate for the pre-printed contact directories was approximately $25 each. These were more readily available to
