The composition of the calcified matrix of long bone from male Sprague-Dawley rats on different diets was analysed by HPLC and analyzed by SDS-PAGE and image analysis. For both analyses the calcified matrix in newly formed bone was obtained by digesting of the distal end of diaphyses for 2 h at 60 degrees C in 0.2 M hydrochloric acid. In acid-soluble matrix the levels of hydroxyproline and hydroxylysine were estimated to be 0.6 and 2.3 nmol/mg protein, respectively. The content of tryptophan, as determined by HPLC, was around 0.3 nmol/mg protein. The content of apatite, as analysed by x-ray diffraction, was 0.30 and 0.34 g/cm3 in newly formed bone from rats on diets containing 1.25 g/100 g protein (control diet) and 0.08 g/100 g protein (diet without calcium), respectively. The possible involvement of carbohydrates in the mineral matrix of newly formed bone was demonstrated by SDS-PAGE and a zymographic technique. The carbohydrate moiety was released by proteolytic treatment of the acid-soluble matrix and it was positive for periodic acid Schiff, indicating the presence of glycosaminoglycan structures. The composition of the mineral matrix analysed by HPLC and X-ray diffraction methods was very similar.With mobile application development, a web portal is not the only thing that is needed. There are different kinds of browser used by different user's, there are a number of applications that a mobile application can have while the purpose is usually to make access to the web. As for many mobile applications, there are available for users to find how to get there rather than using just a web browser. Usability The web portals that are meant to be used with computers can be used by mobile devices as well, such as a mobile phone or a mobile device. However
