of Britishness has been breathed back into British food. When a nation celebrates Britishness it's a way of showing that it sees something special about itself. A spirit of joy and a sense of belonging. But where does it come from? Shared Memories For some, the thought of our past glories is a distant memory. But for many that's when the thought of the British past started. And for those who see immigration as a threat, it's a shared memory what it was like to be British when England's empire was supreme. When Mary Berry says she is fed up with the thought that our children are no longer British, it's no surprise because she's at the Royal Albert Hall to show that British food and cooking is as relevant as ever. In a speech at the 'Food and wine-tasting evening', Mary Berry said: "I am fed up with the thought that our children will know nothing about food, but some will know nothing about Britain. I want them to know our history. I want them to know the real quality of our food." In her speech she highlighted the need for reasserting Britishness. Mary Berry said: "I love getting recipes from older chefs and cooks, but the older you get the less likely you are to find out how to cook. It's the same with food. I want people to taste the quality of British food in the future, the old recipes that were known for their quality." Her comments were made about the value of having a sense of place and a connection to the landscape, and the other things that are part and parcel of being British. For Mary Berry her English heritage started with her mother making traditional English food in their garden. In an interview Mary Berry said: "My mum had the spirit of England very much in our garden c6a93da74d
